ously last night at the Waldorf-Astoria in honor of Mr. Van Amringe himself.

The Early Eighties, the men who were graduated from Columbia from 1880 to hosts, and they were assisted by all of the classes from the graybeards of '56 down to the downy cheeked infants of '08. The dinner was in celebration of Dean Van Amringe's birthday and his fiftieth anniversary as a teacher at Columbia. The dean himself refused to tell anybody how old he was, not even when the classes hawled enticingly at him from their tables. His years lie somewhere-according to undergraduate belief-between 70 and 102.

Also the dinner was distinctly unusual in that it was a banquet of New Yorkers in New York, a phenomenon which might have interested Gov. Hughes, who remarked at a public dinner last winter that he had never heard of one. Not more than one-fourth of the Columbia folk were born outside of this city, according to the university statistician.

James Duane Livingston, the president of the university alumni association, presided, with Dean Van Amringe on his right. The others at the main table were President Nicholas Murray Butler of the university; Seth Low, formerly president of Columbia: Charles F. Chandler, John W. Burgess, Frederick A. Goetze, William H. Burr, Julian T. Davies, George Waddington, John B. Pine, Judge Lacombe, Justice Dugro, Isaac N. Auringe was escorted to the dais by Toestmaster Livingston and President Sutler the Columbia men by classes exploded cheers, all in honor of Mr. Van Ameringe. Class after class arose and chatted their year of pride, followed always by three pounding "Van Ams." There wasn't a minute's lull in the cheerng. The venerable dean appeared to njoy the show hugely. Occasionally e leaned forward to wave a hand at a class of oldsters who were doing the best they could with a newfangled cheer celebrations. We have had, said Dr. Butler, celebrations in honor of Darwin, Lincoln, Poe and other famous persons. "Now," he continued, "we are getting down to business. We have only cir-cumstantial evidence that the persons have mentioned benefited their country, my side sits a man who is evi-

John Kendrick Bangs went to bat when President Butler was retired on three cheers with a brand new poem devoted entirely to Dean Van Amringe.

Here is a verse on which Mr. Bangs leaned with a poet's pride:

We had with flowing hearts this perfect flower Of the humanity, And sweet Van Amity,

That sheds such fragrance rare Un the Van Ambient air!

Pages further on Mr. Bangs tossed ne to the cheering classes: he never in this world of sin brutal and fantastic grin

So fades the darkening chard away." Vell, after that it was impossible for the dean to sound his voice through the grand ballroom for at least three minutes.

grand ballroom for at least three minutes. In feigned disappointment and simulated rage the classes stood up and roared at the Dean, who smiled back quizzically. He had the best of the joke and knew it. "There was a story," he continued, "that I was present as an infant in arms and crowing lustily at the laying of the cornerstone of King's College by the Governor of the province of New York; that I took part in drafting the provisions of the proposed Charter of 1774, designed to make of King's College the mother of the American University'; and that I taught De Witt Clinton of the first class after the revolutionary war. class after the revolutionary war.

The dean talked to them about the pleasures that fifty years of teaching have brought to him and of his conceptave brought him and of his conceptave brought him and of his conceptave brought him and tion of the duty of a teacher. Then he went on:

The Columbia University men who have hurdled whole fences of equations and logarithms and things elevated to the nth power set up by Dean John Howard Van Amringe, as well as some other Columbia University men who were thurked by the dean, sang that tumultuously last night at the Waldorf-Astoria and who, in making this world the brighter and the better for your having lived in it, are, so far as I have any part in you, my exceeding great reward. [Applause.] God bless you every one!"

Assistant Secretary of the Navy Satterlee, Seth Low and Charles F. Chandler made short speeches full of pleasant things about Dean Van Amringe. Then Julien T. Davies arose at the Dean's side. He reviewed Dean Van Amringe's career and then presented to the Dean, on the part of the alumni of Columbia, a large silver loving cup, together with a parchiment scroll, rolled on ebony, on which was inscribed the names of all of the men inscribed the names of all of the men attending the dinner.

C. P. Sawyer opened the speechmaking with an explanation of how the Early Eighties got the jump on the other classes in arranging the celebration. It all came down to the undeniable gfact that the fellows of the Early Eighties were the flower of Columbia's flock and that their gray matter was more constantly in a state of high activity. [Outraged groans from the Sixties, Seventies, the Late Eighties, the Ninetics and a bunch of loos.]

James Duane Livingston wanted to know why the alumni of Columbia couldn't have an alumni dinner like the graduates of Yale or Harvard or Princeton. He suggested that the dinner to Dean Van Aturinge be the first in a series of annual celebrations of Columbia men. Then he introduced President Butler.

The columns of smoke and steam from the towering buildings were often mush-roomed by the oppressive air aloft. Sometimes the mingled vapors from exhausts and chimneys awung fantastically downward and wove themselves around the towers like the drapery of a skirt dancer.

The motions of the curling vapors were sluggish and occasionally they blotted out for a minute or more the sky piercing cupola of the Singer Building.

Aloft it was a city of mezzotints and weird, Aladdin lamp smoke shapes. The cause of it all, as explained by the meteorologists, was the absence of wind aloft to take away the smoke of the great city, and it stretched like the top of a mighty and a dirty tent over all the five broughs until the wind got enough force about 3 o'clock in the afternoon to drive it away. The sun struggled to show itself about this time, but succeeded merely in making a golden blotch in the mists. Helping the arrested smoke and moist day.
